Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran A/HRC/22/56 para 78(c)

Full recommendation:

Desist from actions designed to injure or intimidate those who work to identify human rights violations, promote redress, and those that may cooperate with international human rights mechanisms.

Assessment using Impact Iran human rights indicators¹

The UN Declaration on Human Rights Defenders (HRDs), adopted by consensus by the UN General Assembly in 1998, recognizes the role of HRDs in the advancement of human rights, often exposing them to additional and specific risks and thus requiring specific measures for their protection. While the Declaration is not, in itself, a binding document, it articulates existing international human rights in a context applicable to the work of HRDs. Notably, the Declaration reiterates the State's duty to protect the rights to freedom of expression,² assembly³ and association⁴ for all, and specifically calls on States to guarantee these rights as they are crucial for any type of human rights work.5

Article 27 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran⁶ ostensibly protects the right to freedom of peaceful assembly, however only if it is not "in violation of the fundamental principles of Islam." There is no clear definition or criteria that define what can be considered "fundamental principles of Islam," therefore granting the State with significant leeway to restrict the rights that contain such condition. Similar restrictions can also be found under Article 2 of the Law on Political Crimes, adopted in 2016, where stipulated that participation in an unauthorized assembly, even if it is peaceful, can effectively be considered a political offence.⁷

Similarly, the right to freedom of expression, recognised under Article 24 of the Constitution is restricted if "deemed harmful to the principles of Islam or the rights of the public". Article 40 further allows for restrictions of rights, including peaceful assembly, if their exercise is deemed "injurious to others" or "detrimental to public interests". Similar provisions restrict the right to freedom of expression online through the criminalization of vaguely worded offences such as the

"dissemination of lies" and what is deemed to offend "public morality and chastity." The 1986 Press Law and its subsequent amendments also significantly obstructs the right to freedom of expression, in particular for the media. The law mentions that publications should "duly [observe] Islamic criteria and the best interests of the community." It also provides twelve conditions under which the press might be censored, including "publishing heretical articles," "spreading fornication and forbidden practices," and "propagating and spreading overconsumption." ¹⁰

These restrictions are reiterated in the revised version of the Islamic Penal Code,¹¹ adopted in 2013. For instance, those participating in peaceful unauthorised assemblies can be sentenced to prison terms on the charges of "gathering and colluding to commit crimes against national security" (Article 610 of the Islamic Penal Code),¹² "forming a group composed of more than two people with the purpose of disrupting national security" (Article 498) ¹³ and/or "membership of a group with the purpose of disrupting national security" (Article 499). Other criminal charges include "spreading propaganda against the system," ¹⁴ conspiracy against the State, ¹⁵ encouragement to "violate public morals" ¹⁶ as well as satire. ¹⁷ Similar vaguely worded provisions criminalize acts such as swearing at ¹⁸ or insulting ¹⁹ "the Great Prophet of Islam" as well as "sowing corruption on earth" ²⁰ with the death penalty.

All the restrictions aforementioned fail to meet requirements of international standards, including the principles of legality and that limitations must be necessary, proportionate and in pursuit of one of a limited number of narrowly drawn legitimate aims. ²¹ Consequently, the current Iranian legal framework grants authorities' significant discretion to impose overbroad and vague restrictions on individuals' rights in contravention of the Iran's international human rights obligations. As freedom of expression, assembly and association are central to the work of HRDs, they are particularly exposed to State restriction and repression.

Such risk has been confirmed in practice. Iranian authorities frequently rely on the aforementioned legal framework in order to intimidate, arrest and prosecute individuals who peacefully exercise their rights to freedom of expression, association and assembly, 22 23 reportedly targeting disproportionately members of minorities. 24 25 Further, the Government of Iran has been responding to protests with excessive and unlawful force.²⁶

Human rights lawyers have increasingly been targeted for repression, facing arrest, detention, and imprisonment solely for exercising their rights to freedom of expression, association and assembly and for carrying out their professional work to defend their clients.²⁷ Other human rights defenders, including trade unionists, environmental or abolitionist activists have also faced increasing levels of harassment and persecution due to their peaceful activities. ²⁸ ²⁹ ³⁰ ³¹ In his July 2020 report, the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran raised serious concerns over recurrent arrests and detentions of HRDs solely for carrying out their legitimate work. 32 33 34The Special Rapporteur also referred to reports of harassment, imprisonment and mistreatment in prison of HRDs and increasing pressure on their families.³⁵

Despite the existence of several mechanisms that ostensibly accept complaints regarding violations of citizens' rights, such as the Parliament's Article 90 Commission (established based on Article 90 of the Constitution, offering a mechanism to citizens to file complaint against any of the three branches of power) and the Oversight Bodies for the exercise of Citizenship Rights in the country's provincial courts, there is no evidence to suggest that complaints to these bodies are independently reviewed and investigated.³⁶ Additionally, as the State relies on the Iranian legal framework to repress the work of HRDs, access to justice is particularly limited.

In light of the above, the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran has not taken the necessary measures to guarantee the existence of an environment in which all human rights defenders can carry out their legitimate work without risk to their physical and psychological integrity or to any form of restriction, harassment, intimidation or fear of persecution, in accordance with the fundamental principles endorsed in the Declaration on Human Rights Defenders.
